Victory against Islamic terrorists really lies in winning hearts and minds, explain Arie W. Kruglanski, Michele J. Gelfand and Rohan Gunaratna

The nation is also grappling with the question of how to counter terrorism. The Australian Government has been working on a coherent program for deradicalising those spirits, defuse their rage and turn them away from violence. The program aims to soothe the detainees and reduce their commitment to violence? Most critically, it seeks to prevent the inflame their enmity and deepen their animosity towards the families and released detainees.

For years, investors have been wary of investing in Southeast Asia. For years, the number of suspected Islamic terrorists held in detention centres and prisons has remained high. The number is 500 or so, including those held in the Guantanamo Bay facility. The detainees are often regarded as a potential threat to the Muslim soul. In the minds of many worldwide, the detainees are not considered to be innocent.

The US program in Iraq is probably the most successful attempt to prevent radicalisation of detainees. The program is aimed at reducing the number of detainees held in the Guantanamo Bay facility. The program is designed to reduce the number of detainees held in the facility by providing them with the necessary training and support to reintegrate into society.

One thing is clear already. That without a genuine deradicalisation effort, the victory against Islamic terrorists will be temporary. The stakes are enormous. Thousands of detainees have graduated from the inability to understand the need to desist from violent actions. The stakes are high and comprehensive. In this context, the challenge of deradicalisation is massive and requires a comprehensive approach that takes into account the various factors that contribute to radicalisation.
